Provincial NDP governments were elected in the last elections in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Ontario. In each election campaign, the NDP had promised to enact major reforms to reduce poverty and to assist and empower low-income people.

We asked anti-poverty activists in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, and Ontario to comment on how the poor are faring under their respective NDP governments. While acknowledging small improvements, all three are disappointed by the failure of the NDP to make good on their commitments to challenge inequality and poverty and by their capitulation to the 'corporate agenda' Here's what they had to say.
